Adobe has confirmed that future Photoshop CS releases will be region specific. (Note: I have a blog post up about development of the new Photostory feature.) Since we're parsing movies in honor of the 5th anniversary of our Avatar craze, I'm being a bit obvious with this title, but let's look at what's cool about these new features. Monitors need to have resolutions that I can save and print, so it's no surprise that Photoshop CC reviews any monitors with resolutions I can consistently use . I love the thumbnails in the resizing dialog . If you prefer to showcase in digital, 1x or 3x ratios, you can go into the dialog and do sizing that way. Speaking of thumbnails, the new share feature called Photostory only kicks in when a user does a direct export. That can be fixed if a user has a baby and gets tired of opening file after file to make direct exports so we're on it. Animate or draw something. You need an image or video to document the process, and then you need more. Stuff is getting bigger all the time, so you'll need new ways to script functionality. Now that time is appropriately called Aperture , and it's even easier to add scripting. Animation and video are a focus. There are new graphics tablet features, a utility to make a single canvas of several images viewable, a brush cleaner, better 3D capabilities, and probably more I've neglected to mention. If you're on Mac, there's an improved redesigned UI, separate preview and export panels, and added support for discrete GPUs.

You can double-click a color in a swatch group to bring up the Color Picker tool. The Color Picker lets you cycle through all of the available colors in the group, to select the one you want. Instead of choosing a color from a palette, you can click a color on the background and then click on the color swatch to select it. To use Photoshop for some of your day-to-day tasks, such as organizing and manipulating your files, you'll also need to import, crop, resize, and export files. Adobe calls this the export feature. If you like this article, try these:
